

Picking up the pieces

Women are usually the worst affected when disaster strikes. And they're paying the price of climate change across Africa and Asia, says Sarah Gillam of ActionAid

● "You ask how the floods have affected me," said Mahajani Devi from India. "What can I say? It's been the same old story for as long as I can remember. No, we haven't seen any government food or money for flood relief. Hunger is our old friend here." And each year, many more are added to the list of those who suffer the onslaught of floods. The floods affecting Mahajani this summer swept across southern Asia, causing chaos for more than 50 million people, according to the IFRC (Red Cross international federation).

In East and West Africa, unprecedented rains in September destroyed crops, crucially affecting livelihoods and affecting 1.5 million people. In the rural areas, where 80% of the population live, women fetch water and firewood, grow crops for food, look after children and the elderly and tend the sick. But when floods or droughts hit, women's lives become doubly difficult. Trying to pick up the pieces after a disaster is difficult, causing significant psychological and social suffering. Such psychosocial impacts may be acute in the short term, but can undermine people's long-term mental health and well-being.

Research shows that, during emergencies, the number of people with mild or moderate mental health problems will rise by 5-10%. In actual numbers, this means yearly that millions of people are affected emotionally and that their ability to function efficiently is compromised. "Women and children are particularly vulnerable in emergency situations," says Dr Unnikrishnan PV, who leads ActionAid International's psychosocial work. "Loss of family members, traumatic experiences, displacement and constant terror can rewrite their life stories." And the violence against women that's perpetrated in normal circumstances is further magnified in the aftermath of disasters, according to a survey of more than 7,500 women affected by the tsunami. A closer examination shows that violence against women extends beyond the physical, sexual or emotional to persistent discrimination and makes it very difficult for women to recover.

The result of a collaborative effort by 27 leading international humanitarian organisations (including ActionAid and UN agencies), the Inter-Agency Standing Committee (IASC) has released the first guidelines on mental health and psychosocial support in emergency settings. Guidelines stress that the way in which humanitarian aid is provided can have a substantial impact on people's mental health and psychosocial well-being. Coping with nightmares is often one of the many challenges for the survivors of disasters and conflicts, while several agencies repeatedly asking the same set of questions may be equally traumatic. The guidelines call for better cooperation among various constituencies. ActionAid's ongoing psychosocial programmes in tsunami and earthquake situations show that a community-based approach that engages local people, especially women and children, can accelerate the recovery process.
